

Bio for Patrick Boss

Patrick Boss has a wide variety of experience and background in freight transportation, logistics, international trade and public affairs in Washington State.

Patrick Boss has represented several rail-served inland ports, short line railroads and asset-based intermodal carriers in central Washington for many years, and he has also worked with various agricultural shippers and farmers, cold storage companies, import/export companies, and agricultural trade associations, etc., on a variety of projects and activities involving freight and intermodal rail in Washington State.

In particular, Patrick has been actively involved in helping to facilitate the growth and development of rail infrastructure in Quincy, Moses Lake, Warden, and Connell, and has helped secure federal and state rail funding for various rail and freight mobility projects in these communities.

He has also worked in international trade and logistics where he handled and coordinated shipments with truck and rail lines, transloaders, freight forwarders, steamship lines and airlines for export of various perishable products from the US to Latin America and Southeast Asia, and he currently helps various agricultural shippers export products to markets, primarily to Southeast Asia.

Patrick has a Bachelor of Science in Economics from Central Washington University, and a Master's Degree in Business Administration (MBA) from Washington State University.
